How Trucking Companies and Insurers Handle Tractor-Trailer Crash Claims

After a tractor-trailer crash, the injured person usually deals with an insurance company long before any courtroom. Trucking companies and their insurers tend to act quickly, and the steps they take early can shape the claim. Understanding these practices is one reason people talk with a truck accident attorney before giving a statement or signing anything.

How much insurance a trucking company must carry

Minimum levels of financial responsibility are set by the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration (FMCSA) in 49 CFR Part 387. For-hire trucking companies operating vehicles with a gross vehicle weight rating of 10,001 pounds or more must carry at least $750,000 in public liability coverage when they haul nonhazardous property in interstate commerce. Certain hazardous materials require $1,000,000 or $5,000,000 depending on the material. These are floors, not caps, and some trucking companies carry more coverage through excess or umbrella policies. An MCS-90 endorsement may also apply to certain claims, so a truck crash attorney usually asks for every policy that could apply.

The company's first moves

Many trucking companies and insurers have procedures for sending investigators, adjusters or defense lawyers to a serious crash quickly. Their team may photograph the scene, download the engine control module (ECM), talk to witnesses and record vehicle damage. There is nothing improper about truck accident lawyers that semi truck injury lawyers work, but the information they collect goes to the trucking company first. A truck accident lawyer can send a preservation letter asking the company to keep the truck, the ECM and ELD data, camera footage and the driver's records.

Practices an injured person may see

An insurance adjuster may call soon after the crash and ask for a recorded statement. In many cases there is no obligation to give one to the other side's insurer, although a person's own policy may require cooperation with their own insurer. Statements given while hurting or medicated can be used later to dispute the claim. Adjusters may also ask for broad medical authorizations that reach records unrelated to the crash.

Early settlement offers are another common practice. An offer may arrive before the full extent of an injury is known, and accepting it usually means signing a release that ends the claim. Insurers also tend to argue comparative negligence by pointing to the injured driver's speed or lane position. They may also dispute injuries by citing preexisting conditions or gaps in medical treatment.

Social media and surveillance

After a crash, insurers sometimes review public social media posts, searching for photos or comments that appear to conflict with a claimed injury. Some also hire investigators to record video of the injured person in public. One image can be taken out of context, and a brief clip seldom shows what came before or after it. Many people limit what they post while a claim is open, and they keep their own notes on symptoms, missed work and medical visits.

How the claim is valued

A truck injury claim can include damages for medical expenses, lost wages, reduced earning capacity, property damage, and pain and suffering. In wrongful death cases, state law decides what claims exist and who may bring them. A tractor-trailer accident lawyer will usually collect medical records and bills, plus wage documents, before making a demand. Health plans, Medicare or Medicaid may hold liens or reimbursement claims that must be resolved from a settlement.

A note on fees and outcomes

Many truck accident attorneys work on a contingency fee, which means the fee is a percentage of any recovery and is set out in a written agreement. No lawyer or article can promise a particular result, and this is general information rather than legal advice.
