

Describe how you would use an outdoor seating area before choosing its shape or finish. A useful brief explains the activity, its relationship to the house and the parts of the yard you want to keep open.

Explain the intended use

Describe the furniture landscape consultation preparation or activities you have in mind without turning a rough idea into a fixed layout. Note whether the area is mainly for quiet use, shared meals or another purpose. Identify the route from the house and other connections that should be considered during the design discussion.

Discuss surrounding space

Show nearby planting, entrances and existing surfaces. Explain which views or open areas matter to you. Ask how a proposed layout would fit those relationships. Keep an optional feature separate from the essential use so that a revised proposal can still be compared with the original purpose.

Plan for later decisions

Ask which choices need to be settled before the area can be included in a proposal. Record any dimensions or site conditions that still need checking. Keep the selected layout, material discussion and maintenance questions together rather than treating them as unrelated decisions.

Keep the next decision clear

When a selection changes, identify the affected part of the property and the proposal version now under discussion. Retain earlier notes for context while keeping the current description easy to recognize.
