In our view, this stroll perfectly records the significance of the Cotswolds-- a collection of postcard towns tucked along meandering rivers, established against a background of rolling countryside. Ultimately, take some time to explore Bourton-on-the-Water, where a gently squealing river winds with the town, making it the label "The Venice of the Cotswolds." After travelling through the Slaughters, the trail climbs delicately over open areas prior to descending into Naunton, an additional picture-perfect Cotswold village. From there, the path grabs the Warden's Means, leading you to Lower Slaughter and Upper Massacre-- two towns so perfectly maintained they feel frozen in time. The route winds with gently rolling hills, two picturesque river valleys, and four of the most enchanting villages you'll locate anywhere in England. While much of the Cotswolds is understood for mild hills and postcard-perfect towns, this stroll supplies something a little wilder and even more differed.
