

Omaha Business Community and the Law Firm That Grew With It Ask a longtime Omaha business owner what has changed since the 1960s, and the list gets long fast. When Don Erickson opened a law practice here in 1967, with Charles V. Sederstrom joining as a partner shortly after, the local economy leaned heavily on rail, meatpacking, insurance and agriculture. Today Omaha is home to Fortune 500 headquarters, a growing tech startup scene and a deep base of family-owned companies, manufacturers, contractors and logistics firms. Erickson | Sederstrom P.C., L.L.O. grew right along with that business community, from a small practice into a full-service law firm with more than 30 attorneys. That growth tracks what Omaha businesses needed. A company that started in a garage in Benson might later need help with entity selection, then capital formation, then an acquisition, then a transition plan for the next generation. The firm's ten practice areas, from corporate and employment law to real estate, tax, construction, insurance, Helpful hints intellectual property, aviation, litigation and estate planning, reflect that arc. A contractor building along the 120th Street corridor may need construction and real estate counsel in the same year it revisits its employee handbook, and a trucking operation near Interstate 80 may need both insurance defense and corporate governance advice. A developer planning apartments near Midtown Crossing may need real estate, tax and financing advice all at once. Having those services under one roof lets owners call one number.
